Across the markets with available list prices, the top transactions sold for an average of 6.2%, or about <money>$1.25 million</money>, below their original asking prices. All five leading sales in <location value="LU/us.fl.miami" idsrc="xmltag.org">Miami</location>, <location value="LU/us.ga.atlnta" idsrc="xmltag.org">Atlanta</location>, <location value="LU/us.nv.lasveg" idsrc="xmltag.org">Las Vegas</location>, <location value="LU/us.ma.boston" idsrc="xmltag.org">Boston</location> and <location value="LU/us.co.denver" idsrc="xmltag.org">Denver</location> closed below asking. In <location value="LU/us.ca.losang" idsrc="xmltag.org">Los Angeles</location>, four of the five top sales closed 6% to 29% below their original list prices. One of them was the historic former <person>Cecil B. DeMille</person> estate in <person>Los Feliz</person>, which sold for <money>$24.75 million</money>, about 17% under asking.   On the other hand, <location value="LU/us.ca.sanfrn" idsrc="xmltag.org">San Francisco</location> continued to stand apart. Its five priciest sales averaged about 20%, or nearly <money>$1.8 million</money>, above their original asking prices, making it the only market analyzed with an average premium. Four of the five sold above asking and the fifth sold at full list price. The top sale was a restored Edwardian in <location>Presidio Heights</location> that closed for <money>$14.7 million</money>, about <money>$3.7 million</money> above its <money>$11 million</money> list price. The results demonstrate the continued competition for luxury homes as AI-driven wealth supports demand.   The analysis is based on entries in the nation’s <org>Multiple Listing Service</org> platforms and therefore often excludes private and off-market transactions, which are common at the highest tier of the housing market. Because <location value="LS/us.tx" idsrc="xmltag.org">Texas</location> and <location value="LS/us.ut" idsrc="xmltag.org">Utah</location> are nondisclosure states, <org>Homes.com News</org> evaluated the priciest properties in <location value="LU/us.tx.houstn" idsrc="xmltag.org">Houston</location>, <location value="LU/us.tx.dallas" idsrc="xmltag.org">Dallas</location> and <location value="LU/us.ut.sltlkc" idsrc="xmltag.org">Salt Lake City</location> based on listing price.
